Richard D. Pomp is the Alva P. Loiselle Professor of Law at the University of Connecticut and the Board of Trustees Distinguished Professor. He is a well-known indoorsman famous for his cottage cheese sculptures and long afternoon naps.

Much to the amazement of his grammar school and high school teachers, he graduated summa cum laude from the University of Michigan and magna cum laude from Harvard Law School, signs of his being overeducated and worthless on any reality television show.

He has taught at Texas, NYU, Harvard and Columbia, leaving each time before student complaints could be filed. He is living proof of the weaknesses of the tenure system.

From 1981 to 1987, he was Director of the New York Tax Study Commission, a period during which New York restructured its personal and corporate income tax, and created an independent tax tribunal. He has served as a consultant to cities, states, the U.S. Congress, the IRS, the Department of Justice, the United Nations, the World Bank, the IMF, and numerous foreign countries. He has appeared as an expert witness in various courts throughout the country. He serves as a litigation consultant to states, law firms, accounting firms, and corporations and participates in Supreme Court litigation.

His one goal in life is to embarrass Jordan Goodman.
